Introduction:

As both an Individualist and a Socialist, I had no choice but to form my own political ideology. One that takes into consideration the rights and liberty of the individual, while also addressing the needs of the individual. How do you control the economy, but still give people their individual liberty? The answer is Advocacism.

What is Advocatism?

advocalism (noun) : a form of government in which bureaucracies are privatized and an official appointed by the president advocates for each of them.

The official appointed by the President, who presides over the privatized bureaucracies is called a Government Advocate. Only the President can override the Government Advocate. The Government Advocate only oversees all day-to-day operations of their respective office, but every proposal must be officially approved by the Government Advocate. The Advocate can either Approve or Disapprove the proposal.

Monetary System

Since Advocacism privatizes its administrative offices, the money is owned by the government, rather than by a private central bank. This eliminates the Federal Reserve, in favor of a collectivized system, where each bureaucracy must vote on monetary issues, with 2/3rds of the vote required to pass a resolution. Instead, a central bank would be shared by all bureaucracies.

What Advocatism Is:

- ▢ A political ideology that mixes individual liberties with a collectivized monetary system.
- ▢ An equal balance between the people and their government.
- ▢ A non intrusive form of government, despite it's collectivized currency.

What Advocatism Is Not:

- ▢ A catch-all for any political ideology, unlike Anarchism.
- ▢ A Capitalist, Communist, or Fascist form of government.
- ▢ Interventionalist in foreign or domestic policy.

Conclusion

Advocalism is it's own, specific form of fair, equal, and balanced form of government that is the perfect compromise between Individualism and Socialism.
